MEDIATION SERVICES

FAQ

Does a mediator make a final decision like a judge?

No, that's the beauty of mediation. It's a voluntary process where the parties are encouraged to make their own decisions. The law may be discussed, if appropriate, but mediators are there to help facilitate and guide the discussion.

Who pays for the mediator?

Usually the parties split the cost for a mediator. If there are three parties to a mediation, then the bill will be split in thirds. However, responsibility to pay mediation expenses can be discussed during the mediation.

How many sessions does it take to reach a final settlement?

Mediation sessions typically last for 2-3 hours. Some disputes, like complex divorces, may take 3-5 sessions to resolve, while a simple contract dispute may only take 1-2 sessions. All efforts will be made to move through the process efficiently.

Can I force another party to go to mediation?

Unless mediation is court ordered, it is a voluntary process by all parties. Contracts can include an Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR) provision requiring participation in mediation before litigation.
